

M-10 — Business Communication

What is this about?

Getting a decision out of people who are busy, in messages they read to the end.

The idea, in plain terms

Gopal manages operations near Nagpur. He needs a decision on overtime by Friday. He writes a careful 400-word email explaining the background, the options and the costs. By Wednesday, nobody has replied. The ask in the first line, and everything else underneath it.

Key things to know

- EMAIL — a decision you will need a record of, later
- CALL — anything with disagreement or bad news in it
- CHAT — a quick factual question with no consequence
- IN PERSON — anything about a person's performance

A simple example

Situation: You emailed on Monday asking for an overtime decision by Friday. Nobody has replied. The shift has to be booked with the contractor by Friday evening.

What to do: Send a three-line message with the ask, the deadline and the default.

Remember

- Ask first, always — What you need and by when, in the first sentence. Background below.
- One message, one ask — Two questions reliably produce one answer and a week of chasing.
- Say what happens if not — A deadline with no consequence is read as a preference.
- Subject lines carry the decision — Name the decision and the date, not the topic.
- Change channel, do not repeat — After one missed deadline, a two-minute call beats a third email.

Inducto Learning & Knowledge — quick reference for M-10. Watch the lesson video for the full explanation; this page is a takeaway, not a replacement for it.